The date, Jennie said, was fixed for Feb. 2, and she left for her sister's home to prepare the trousceau and wast for the happy day.

Presents were sent and all was arranged, but the day fixed for the wedding brought a great disampointment.

The bridegroom did not appear and Jennie sat for days alone in her little room in her sister's house.

She found that her betrothed had broken faith with her and had wedded another.

One of the dodges that the McAuliffe faction tries to work in on Meyer was a plaster of Paris "sticker" for his wrist and hands, and had it not been for cunning hig Tom Lees, who made McAuliffe remove the glove, he would, no doubt, have put in the would first min in a twelve-foot ring and lock themselves in a room he would fight him for stake money to morrow.

She was unconscious, and was taken to the City Hospital. The physicians found that a builet had entered the head.

It was taken for granted that Miss Englebert had tried to take her life, and the doctors did not think of combating the theory.

To-day the physicians made a closer examination, and they state that it is impossible that the girl should have fired the shot.

The bullet ranged downward from the temple at such an angle as shows that it must have been fired from an elevated position.

There was not the slightest trace of powder on Jennie's fair face when she was taken from the house, and this is regarded as forther proof that a murderer has to be sought and found before justice is done.

Miss Englebert is still alive at the hospital, but in a comatose state, and it is not expected she will revive sufficiently to make any statement of the shooting.

Detectives have been sent for, but have not as yet got to work on the case.
